The three children of Abbott Washburn signed an instrument of gift for the papers in December 2006. Literary rights in the unpublished writings of Abbott Washburn in this collection and in all other collections of papers received by the United States government have been retained by Washburn's children. After the deaths of the children and their spouses such rights will pass to the United States. Under terms of the instrument of gift, the following classes of items are withheld from research use:

1. Papers which constitute an invasion of personal privacy or a libel of a living person.
2. Papers which are required to be kept secret in the interest of national defense or foreign policy, and are properly classified.

Scope and Content Note

Abbott Washburn, public relations specialist, Deputy Director of the U.S. Information Agency, diplomat and Federal Communications Commissioner, was born in Duluth, Minnesota, in 1915. After graduating from Harvard University in 1937 he obtained a job in the public services office of General Mills in Minneapolis. Except for a brief service in World War II he worked at General Mills until 1950 and eventually became Director of Public Services.

In 1950 Washburn became involved with the Crusade for Freedom, a propaganda organization directed by General Lucius Clay. The Crusade was working on a plan to use balloons to drop food packages and propaganda leaflets over the Communist countries of Eastern Europe. General Mills used balloons to circulate advertising leaflets around the United States, so the Crusade contracted with General Mills to provide balloon experts and equipment for the project. Washburn obtained a leave of absence from General Mills to go to Germany to help manage the preparation of the balloons. He eventually became Lucius Clay's executive vice chairman and helped Clay with the Crusade's fund raising activities.

Clay was a close friend of Dwight D. Eisenhower and helped organize Eisenhower's presidential campaign in 1952. Washburn returned to the United States and worked as a public relations advisor for Eisenhower's campaign staff. When Eisenhower became president he created the President's Committee on International Information Activities (the Jackson Committee) to study U.S. propaganda activities. Washburn was hired to be the Committee's executive secretary. This was a full time government job so Washburn resigned from General Mills and moved to Washington, DC to accept the position.

The Jackson Committee finished its studies in July 1953. C.J. Jackson, a member of the White House staff, was designated to follow the implementation of the Committee's recommendations. One of its recommendations was to create a new government agency, the U.S. Information Agency (USIA), to coordinate U.S. propaganda activities. Washburn transferred to the White House and worked as Jackson's assistant for several months, helping to set up the new agency.

The USIA was formally established on August 1953, with Theodore Streibert as director. In November 1953 Washburn was appointed Deputy Director of the USIA. He served in this position until the end of the Eisenhower administration, under Streibert and his successors Arthur Larson and George V. Allen.

As Deputy Director, Washburn oversaw the daily activities of the USIA. He closely followed the progress of Agency programs, such as the Voice of America, foreign cultural exhibits and various educational and propaganda activities. He was also involved with establishing the People to People Program in 1956. In the absence of the Director he represented the USIA at meetings of the National Security Council, the Operations Coordinating Board and the Cabinet. In December 1960, following the resignation of George V. Allen, Washburn became Acting Director of the USIA and served until the new Director, Edward R. Murrow, took over in March 1961.

Washburn left government service in March 1961 to work in public relations. He became Vice President for International Operations of Carl Byoir and Associates, a prominent public relations firm. In the spring of 1962 he left Carl Byoir to start his own public relations firm. He entered into a partnership with McNeil Stringer and created the firm Washburn, Stringer Associates. Stringer was an American businessman based in Mexico City, Mexico. He was active in the American Chamber of Commerce in Mexico City and had previously been the representative of the Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing Company (3M) in Mexico.

Abbott Washburn was president of Washburn, Stringer and managed the firm's office in Washington, DC. Stringer managed the firm's office in Mexico City. Their main client was the Consejo Mexicano de Relaciones Publicas (Mexican Public Relations Council), a group of Mexican businessmen who were trying to encourage U.S. private investment in Mexico. Washburn, Stringer organized the group's publicity campaign in the U.S. by producing newsletters promoting the advantages of doing business in Mexico.

Washburn, Stringer also worked with the Advertising Council to develop a series of Round Table discussions between U.S. and foreign business men in underdeveloped countries. Such discussions were held in Mexico, India and Brazil. The firm also provided publicity for a group of Algerian dignitaries who toured the U.S. in 1964.

Outside of his professional activities, Washburn remained active in the People-to-People program, and served as president of People-to-People for 12 months following the retirement of Joyce C. Hall.

In 1967 Washburn, Stringer became inactive after losing several of its main clients. Washburn closed the Washington, DC, office of the firm in August 1967 and operated out of his home for several months until the partnership was dissolved. He provided public relations services for a few organizations, particularly the Committee for Peace with Freedom in Vietnam. In May 1968 he went to work fulltime for Richard Nixon's presidential campaign staff. In April 1969, after becoming president, Nixon appointed Washburn to a diplomatic position in the Department of State.

Washburn's new position was Deputy Chairman of the U.S. delegation to the Intelsat conference. Intelsat had been organized in 1964 under an interim agreement to coordinate international use of telecommunications satellites. The interim agreement specified that a more permanent arrangement would be negotiated after five years. In February and March 1969 an international conference was held to begin developing a permanent arrangement for Intelsat. The conference was unable to reach an agreement, largely due to differences over how Intelsat was to be organized. It was decided to appoint a preparatory committee to work out the differences, which would be implemented at a second conference in 1971.

The chairman of the U.S. delegation to the preparatory committee was William Scranton, a Republican from Pennsylvania who had assisted Richard Nixon during the 1968 campaign. Scranton resigned in December 1969 and Washburn was promoted to head the delegation, a position he held until the end of the conference in 1971.

As chairman, Washburn worked with delegations from several countries that used international telecommunications satellites. Major areas of disagreement included the nature of the final Intelsat organization, whether it would have a strong Director General or rely on the work of a governing board, and whether the United States would launch communications satellites for member countries that would only benefit a small geographic region rather than the Intelsat organization as a whole. Most of the disagreements were resolved in preliminary negotiations during 1969 and 1970. The final Intelsat treaty was approved at a conference in Washington, DC in June 1971.

In December 1971, after the ratification of the treaty was well underway, Washburn transferred to the Office of Telecommunications Policy (OTP) in the Executive Office of the President. In this position he was a consultant on international telecommunications to the Director of OTP, Clay Thomas Whitehead.

Washburn's major duty in OTP was following Congressional hearings on Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. He was especially concerned over efforts by Senator William Fulbright to close the radios by cutting their budget. Washburn also followed the ratification of the Intelsat treaty, and encouraged the Department of State to urge action by countries that were slow to act on the treaty.

In July 1974 Washburn was appointed to the Federal Communications Commission (FCC), on which he served until October 1982. His experience with the Intelsat negotiations made him the FCC's expert on space communications. He helped Alaska utilize satellites to bring communications to isolated areas of the state. He was a strong supporter of the Fairness Doctrine which encouraged broadcasting networks to cover all sides of controversial issues. He also studied the influence of television on children.

In October 1982, at the end of his term as FCC Commissioner, Washburn was appointed head of the U.S. delegation to the 1983 Regional Administrative Radio Conference. This was an international meeting held in Geneva in June and July 1983 to apportion the use of direct broadcast satellites by countries in North and South America. Washburn spent late 1982 and early 1983 preparing for the conference. After the conference he spent several months preparing the final report of the U.S. delegation. During this period he also served as a consultant to the FCC on space communications, and continued to have an office at the FCC.

In early November 1983 Washburn retired from government service but continued his interest in telecommunications. In November 1984 President Reagan issued a determination stating that privately operated communications satellites would be in the national interest. Several private companies applied to the FCC for permission to develop their own communications satellites. The Department of State hired Washburn as a consultant to study the impact of private satellites on Intelsat, which the U.S. was bound by law to support. Washburn closely followed the development of private satellites and felt they would damage the effectiveness of Intelsat. He wrote and lectured extensively, stating that the U.S. should closely study the matter before allowing private companies compete with Intelsat. In 1991, following the collapse of Communism in Eastern Europe, President George H.W. Bush appointed Washburn to a special presidential task force that studied the role of U.S. government broadcasting in the post-Cold War world.

In retirement, Washburn served on a number of corporate boards. He closely followed the work of the USIA and the People-to-People program. During the Eisenhower centennial in 1990 he assisted in raising funds for a series on television programs on the life of Dwight D. Eisenhower. Washburn died in Washington, DC, in December 2003.

The papers of Abbott Washburn are divided into ten series which cover the main periods of his life and government career. The first series pertains to his work prior to joining the USIA in late 1953. It includes his early personal correspondence, and files on his early work at General Mills, the Crusade for Freedom, the 1952 presidential campaign, and the Jackson Committee. The most extensive files relate to the Crusade for Freedom. These contain considerable information on the use of balloons to distribute food packages and propaganda leaflets over the communist countries of Eastern Europe. There is relatively little information on the 1952 campaign and the work of the Jackson Committee. The papers of C.D. Jackson and the surviving records of the Jackson Committee are at the Eisenhower Library.

The second series covers Washburn's work at the U.S. Information Agency during the Eisenhower administration. The files contain relatively little information on the Agency as a whole. Most of the material relates to specific USIA programs in which Washburn had a personal interest.

The third series covers Washburn's work during the 1960s when he operated a private public relations firm in partnership with McNeil Stringer. Most of the material pertains to the firm's major clients, such as the Advertising Council, the Algerian government and a group of Mexican businessmen. Of particular importance is an extensive series of files on the People-to-People program dating from 1964 to 1965 when Washburn was president of the organization.

The fourth series covers Washburn's service as an ambassador to negotiate the Intelsat treaty and his work with the Office of Telecommunications Policy (OTP). The material pertains largely to the negotiation of the treaty and the efforts to convince the participating countries to ratify it. The series also contains a small quantity of information on the organization of the OTP and the work of its director Clay Thomas Whitehead.

The fifth series covers Washburn's work as a Federal Communications Commissioner. The material is divided into six subseries. These consist of a chronological file of letters written by Washburn; copies of his speeches, articles and public statements; his social correspondence; a subject file on major issues coming before the FCC; a reference file on children's television; and reference material on the history of communications. The material pertains largely to Washburn's personal interests. There is extensive material on advertising, children's television, censorship, the fairness doctrine, the use of telecommunications satellites, and a proposed U.S. exhibition in Beijing, China. However, there is no information on the internal workings of the FCC staff or on Washburn's discussions of FCC matters with the other commissioners.

The sixth series pertains to Washburn's work at the 1983 Regional Administrative Radio Conference. There is extensive technical information on the use of telecommunications and direct broadcast satellites by developing countries in Latin America.

The seventh series contains information collected by Washburn while serving as a consultant for the Department of State in the mid-1980s. Most of the material relates to the impact on Intelsat caused by private communications satellites.

The eighth series contains information on Washburn's service on a special task force appointed by President George Bush in 1991 to study U.S. broadcasting policy. It is arranged in two subseries: a subject file containing correspondence, working papers and drafts of the task force's final report; and a reference file of publications and reports relating to international broadcasting, most of which pertains to Radio Free Europe, Radio Liberty, the Voice of America and the U.S. Information Agency. The task force concentrated on the role of RFE/RL and VOA in Europe following the collapse of the Communist regimes. However, it also studied U.S. broadcasts to Cuba, and proposals to create a new Radio Free China to broadcast to Red China.

The ninth series contains information on Washburn's activities after his retirement from government service. It is arranged in two subseries: a subject file, containing information on subjects and organizations in which Washburn was interested; and a chronological file, containing information on Washburn's speeches, trips and other activities. There is extensive material on Washburn's work for Lorimar and Metro Mobile companies, his interest in People-to-People programs, his fund-raising work for programs associated with the Eisenhower centennial in 1990, his continuing interest in telecommunications satellites, and proposals to start a government radio station to broadcast to Red China.

The tenth series contains Washburn's address and appointment books covering extended periods of his life. It also contains information collected in 1964 by his wife Wanda Washburn while working on a proposed book on government broadcasting for Henry Loomis, the director of Voice of America.
